In 2009, my once conventional practice added essential oils to a strong list of natural modalities which catapulted my clinic to a whole new level of service and success in a very conservative community in Wisconsin. In 2013 we were Business of the Year. As I traveled the country to attend seminars and courses which taught about herbs and acupuncture, I learned that adding natural modalities to my knowledge base improved my scope of practice and provided me with more tools to better service every case which came through my doors.

We are living in a world which is becoming increasingly toxic and where standard treatments have side effects and are becoming less effective. Essential oils provide an alternative, and often even a first line approach, to handle these concerns.

Last year my practice had revenue approx $30,000 from essential oils sales alone, which adds value to both our clients and clinic alike.

Aromatherapy and essential oils are becoming a household topic. They are readily available with wide spread benefits, so, educated use is necessary. The Veterinarian and Veterinary Technician need to be versed in the safe and effective use of these powerful substances. Educating yourself on how they work and their safe use should be a priority for any veterinarian that wants to advise their clients in the best possible way. Presenting are veterinarians that have up to 19 years of clinical experience with the proper use of essential oils with animals. The good, the bad and the smelly will be presented to provide you with an up-to-date education of this vital healing art.
